Thanks. This is my lean but am open to any additional input. This will go on my shortlist for Chuck later.

I think that sounds great – to give broad categories of folks in the room.

We can def stall, just want to figure out the ultimate answer. And that's true about reporters scanning the room.

Another option is not release the list but give a few illustrative examples of leaders we invited... Area elected officials; Business groups like the board of trade, greater Washington partnership; to civic associations like ; and community activists like .

I think that would be VERY generous to share the list with reporters. Some may ask but I think we can stall, just implying that things are too busy right there in the moment – “Can you leave your card with me and I can see if it's something we can send over after the event?” Everyone will be in name tags and a good reporter can just make the rounds and observe the people who are there. But I don't think we need to share the list.

Think there could be more upside vs. downside in sharing – as it's a diverse group and includes some naysayers? (but interested to hear others)

Suppose one downside might be those who didn't get an invite into the room feeling left out.

OK thanks.

Possible some members of the public or media may ask to see our invite list. COG's not-FOIAable so we don't need to provide but there's a perception thing there, too. Need to think about that one a little. Let me know if you have thoughts on that.

How does this sound? Borrowed some language from the Run of Show.

- The focus of this event is for COG's members, partners, and community stakeholders to have an in-depth discussion. We've worked with our members to ensure a diverse group of community leaders were invited. We are also offering a livestream for others interested in following the discussion.
- There will be many other opportunities for engagement related to specific Amazon projects and site plans.
- We encourage everyone to follow updates on the Arlington County /Amazon website and the State website. (we can provide links on our site to these...)

Additional points for media sign-in.

- Remind media that the program is for stakeholder questions/not media questions.
- Mention that post-event we can help connect media with interviewees (day-of we can confirm that we can offer Dorsey, at least)
